

Work-life balance

Work-life balance means to have a good balance between your work life and your private life. These two should harmonize well together.

Burnout

Some people prioritize their career over their private life, working overtime while completely neglecting their social life. After some years, this results in a burnout in a lot of cases. A burnout is a term for certain types of personal crises in response to ongoing stress and work overload.

The importance of a good work-life balance

A burnout is accompanied by emotional exhaustion, a feeling of being overwhelmed and reduced performance satisfaction. Burnout syndromes can begin with rather inconspicuous early symptoms and lead to complete inability to work or suicide. This shows how important a good work-life balance really is.

Enjoyable job

It is also important to have a job that you enjoy, because most of the time in your life is spent at work. If you have a job that you barely like or don't like at all, you will be unhappy quickly, which will also influence your private life. People who are unhappy with their job are also unhappy in their private life most of the times. When someone spends half of the day unhappy, it also wears off on the people they surround themselves with.

Private life

Another important thing to keep in mind is that you should do fun activities in your private life that you enjoy. If you get up every day just to go to work, and then do nothing else the rest of the day, your life will be boring quickly.

Separating work and private life

When trying to maintain a good work-life balance, you should separate your work life from your private life, drawing a line between them. Some people make the mistake to do work related stuff in their private life. The problem with this is that you always have work in your mind. This is a problem, because you can never truly enjoy your free time.