

Migration

Definition

Migration is defined as a movement of a person from one locality or country to another one. This movement could be temporary or permanent. You can look at migration from the side of the country where the people leave the location or from the other country where the people come from another country.

Emigration – is migrating out of a country or a place

Immigration – is migrating into a new place or a country

Reasons for Migration:

- lack of opportunity
- lack of safety
- high crime
- famine
- war
- escape poverty
- due to environmental factors
- to escape conflict zone
- high standard of living
- personal needs
- higher education
- family influences
- infrastructure
- presence of family and friends

The reasons why people would migrate from their homes to a new place can be divided into two categories:

Pull factors – are conditions and reasons that attract people to a new area

Push factors – are conditions and reasons that drive people away from their homes

Age group/gender most prone to migrate

Young people are more likely to migrate than older people. The age of migrants generally is in the mid to late 20s. It is also common that men are more likely to migrate than women. In addition, for both sexes, the variable of marital status is significant and confirms that, for women and men, the probability to migrate is higher among non-married persons.

Effects of migration

Negative impacts on the destination country/place:

- Pressure on public services such as schools, housing, and healthcare
- Overcrowding
- Language and cultural barriers can exist
- Increased levels of pollution
- Increased pressure on natural resources
- Racial tensions and discrimination
- Local people can miss out on jobs due to increased competition from migrants
- Migrant groups may not assimilate into local communities

- Gender imbalance

Positive effects on the destination country/place:

- Cultural diversity gets increased
- Skills gaps or know how are filled
- Boost to the local economy
- Qualified staff
- Birth rates can increase

Negative impacts on the origin country/place:

- Less people to pay tax
- Less people with skills
- Economic development
- Gender imbalance

Positive effects on the origin country/place:

- Less unemployed people because of less competition for jobs
- Less pressure on natural resources
- New skills and knowledge if the migration is temporary
- Less pressure on services

Minorities

Definition

A minority group is a smaller group than the majority of a country with another religion, race, ethnicity or other characteristics. These groups mostly experience disadvantages compared to members of a dominant social group (=majority).

Definition

Types of minorities

National minorities – who live in another, often neighbouring state

Transnational minorities – whose homeland stretches across several different states

Immigrant minorities – who have moved to another country

Racial or ethnic minorities – who possess certain physical features which distinguish them from the nation's majority of population

Language minorities – whose first language is not the same as the mother language of the ethnic majority of the country they live in. They mostly have the right to be educated in their language
